Dear John O'Reilly,

We hope this email finds you well, we are emailing to inform you on our decisions about certain aspects of the website.

We understand as per your request that you would like for the webpage to cater for colour blind individuals like yourself. We have adhered to this request by implementing certain design elements to the website. For example, the simple black and white contrast of the background and the text allows for colour blind users to have just as much readability as non-colour-blind users .The website also avoids colours like red-green and blue-yellow, as these colours often make it difficult for colour blind individuals to differentiate. The website also follows the WCAG guidelines for accessibility, for example we follow their contrast ratio, as they recommend it for allowing a universal user experience. We implemented alt test for the images on the website, this allows for users using a screen reader to have a much better user experience as the alt text is read out. This may also prove useful for users that are colour blind as some of the images may be hard for them to decipher. Text that is more important is in bold and is also larger than the surrounding text. No information is conveyed by colour alone.

The link provided is a link to the website. -- Wheels on Fire

Kind Regards,

The Development Team.